What Is Jewish Kabbalah, And How Do I Know If My Pastor Is Associated with It?

Sixbert SANGWA • August 06, 2024

Jewish Kabbalah, a mystical and esoteric branch of Jewish thought, delves into the deeper, spiritual dimensions of the Jewish faith. Developed between the 6th and 13th centuries among Jews in Babylonia, Italy, Provence, and Spain, it seeks to uncover hidden meanings in the Hebrew Scriptures and provides a framework for understanding the relationship between God, the universe, and humanity. However, while Kabbalah offers rich insights into Jewish mysticism, its teachings and practices often contradict core Christian doctrines. This article explores the historical background of Kabbalah, its symbols and rituals, the potential dangers of Christian ministers engaging with Kabbalistic practices, and how believers can discern and guard against such influences.

Historical Background of Jewish Kabbalah

The word "Kabbalah" means "to receive" and refers to revelations from God received by Jews and passed down through oral tradition. Kabbalah initially encompassed mainstream Jewish teachings but later came to signify a secret knowledge believed to be granted only to a select few, revealing the "true" meaning of Scriptures. Foundational texts of Kabbalah include the "Zohar," attributed to Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai but likely authored by Moses de León in the 13th century, as well as the "Sefer Yetzirah" (Book of Creation) and the "Bahir."

Core Concept and Teachings of Kabbalah

Kabbalistic theology posits that God is Ein Sof, an infinite and unknowable entity beyond human comprehension. This concept emphasizes God's transcendence, existing beyond all limitations and categories, contrasting with the personal God revealed in the Bible. Central to Kabbalistic thought is the concept of the Sefirot, ten divine emanations through which God interacts with the world. These include Keter (Crown), Chokhmah (Wisdom), Binah (Understanding), Chesed (Mercy), Gevurah (Judgment), Tiferet (Beauty), Netzach (Eternity), Hod (Glory), Yesod (Foundation), and Malkhut (Kingship). Depicted as a Tree of Life, they represent the dynamic flow of divine energy and attributes.

Kabbalah teaches that "emanations" from God performed the work of creation, denying that creation was a direct act of God as described in Genesis 1. With each descending emanation, the emanation became farther away from God, with the final emanation taking the personal form of angels. This concept contradicts the biblical teaching of God's direct and creative act.

Tikkun Olam refers to the human responsibility to repair and restore the world through ethical behavior and mystical practices aimed at mending the spiritual fabric of the universe. Kabbalistic practice often involves meditation, prayer, and contemplation of divine names and Hebrew letters, believed to open spiritual channels and enable practitioners to ascend through levels of divine consciousness.

Contradictions to Christianity

While Kabbalah shares some similarities with Christian mysticism in its pursuit of deeper spiritual understanding, there are significant theological contradictions. Kabbalah's depiction of God as Ein Sof contrasts sharply with the Christian understanding of God as a personal, loving Creator who reveals Himself in Jesus Christ (John 3:16; John 17:3). The Kabbalistic concept of the Sefirot differs fundamentally from the Christian doctrine of the Trinity.

Christianity teaches that there is one God in three persons—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—who are co-equal and co-eternal (Matthew 28:19; 2 Corinthians 13:13). Kabbalistic interpretations often rely on mystical, allegorical, and numerological readings of Scripture, leading to interpretations that diverge significantly from traditional Christian teachings. Christianity emphasizes the literal, historical, and theological reading of the Bible (2 Timothy 3:16-17).

Kabbalah exhibits a pantheistic quality, suggesting that creation is one of God's emanations. This contrasts with the biblical teaching that God is separate from His creation, having created all that exists from nothing (Genesis 1:1). Additionally, Kabbalah, like many other false doctrines, denies the deity of Christ and the necessity of faith in Him as the only means of salvation (John 14:6). Christianity teaches that Jesus is God in the flesh, who came to die for the sins of all who would believe in Him (John 1:1-3; Romans 8:3).

Symbols and Rituals in Kabbalah

Kabbalah is rich in symbols and rituals distinct from mainstream Jewish and Christian practices. One of the most prominent symbols is the Tree of Life, which represents the ten Sefirot and their interconnections. The Tree of Life serves as a map of spiritual reality and a guide for the Kabbalist's spiritual journey. Additionally, Kabbalists believe that Hebrew letters and divine names hold profound spiritual significance. The Tetragrammaton (YHWH), for example, is considered particularly sacred and powerful. Kabbalistic amulets and talismans are also common, often inscribed with divine names, Hebrew letters, and other symbols believed to offer protection, healing, and spiritual empowerment. Another key aspect of Kabbalah is Gematria, a practice that uncovers hidden meanings in the Scriptures by analyzing the numerical values of words and phrases.

How can Christians know if a Christian minister is associated with Kabbalah?

In recent years, concerns have risen over Christian ministers secretly associating with Kabbalistic practices, seeking occult powers for prophecy, healing, or performing miracles. This involvement poses significant theological and spiritual dangers. Blending Kabbalistic practices with Christian teachings can lead to syncretism, diluting the Gospel and confusing believers. Engaging in Kabbalistic practices can open individuals to spiritual influences contrary to biblical teachings. Ministers seeking power outside the Holy Spirit may produce false prophecies and counterfeit miracles, leading people astray (Matthew 24:24; 2 Thessalonians 2:9).

Christians should exercise discernment and be vigilant in identifying ministers influenced by Kabbalistic or occult practices. Signs to watch for include teachings that deviate from core Christian doctrines, which should be compared with Scripture and scrutinized (Acts 17:11). The use of Kabbalistic symbols, such as the Tree of Life or Hebrew letters in ministry materials or decor, can be a red flag. Be wary of ministers claiming hidden knowledge not available to the average believer (James 1:5; John 8:32). Participation in mystical practices like meditation on divine names or the use of talismans should be approached with caution. Evaluate the consistency and biblical soundness of prophecies and miracles claimed by the minister.

Some Christian ministers buy or obtain tallit (Jewish prayer shawls) from Jews, granting them the power to perform miracles and prophesy. The tallit is traditionally used in Jewish prayer, symbolizing a connection to God. However, these ministers misuse the tallit, as a mystical object that can imbue them with supernatural abilities. In addition to wearing the tallit, some ministers use it as decor or wear clothing adorned with images of the tallit, further suggesting that its presence grants them divine power.

The lampstand, or menorah, is another item that some Christian ministers associated with Kabbalah incorporate into their practices. In the Old Testament, the menorah was a sacred object in the Tabernacle and the Temple, symbolizing God's presence and the light of His guidance. These Kabbalah-associated ministers, however, place these lampstands in their churches and use them in a quasi-magical way to channel divine energy or influence spiritual realms.

The concept of the ladder is drawn from the biblical story of Jacob's ladder, where Jacob saw angels ascending and descending between heaven and earth (Genesis 28:12). In a distorted imitation of this vision, some Kabbalah-associated ministers use the ladder as a symbolic tool to interact with spiritual beings. However, unlike Jacob's vision, which depicted a connection to God's messengers, these ministers often use the ladder in ways that align more with occult practices, suggesting they can summon or communicate with demonic entities. Pastors associated with Kabbalah may use the ladder in their churches or incorporate its symbols into their decor to demonstrate their claimed spiritual power.

The inclusion of these items—tallit, lampstands, and ladder—along with symbols associated with Freemasonry, can indicate an alignment with Kabbalistic or occult traditions. By adopting and misusing these objects and symbols, these ministers blur the line between biblical faith and mystical or occult practices, leading their followers into potentially dangerous spiritual territory.

Conclusion

Jewish Kabbalah, while offering profound mystical insights within the Jewish tradition, significantly diverges from core Christian doctrines. Its abstract concept of God as Ein Sof, the use of the Sefirot, and its pantheistic tendencies contrast sharply with the Christian understanding of a personal, loving God who reveals Himself in Jesus Christ. The blending of Kabbalistic practices with Christian teachings can lead to syncretism, potentially confusing believers and diluting the Gospel. Christians must exercise discernment, remain grounded in Scripture, and be vigilant against the influences of Kabbalistic and occult practices to uphold the integrity of their faith and guard against deception.
